Did you know Dr. David Livingstone was a Congregationalist?

David Livingstone was a minister, physician, missionary, explorer, and abolitionist. He was Scottish and was sent to Africa on a mission. His idea was to share Christ's word with the natives and establish types of trade that would replace the East African Arab-Swahili slave trade.

Much of the interior of Africa was unknown to Europeans. Travel there was difficult, but the malaria, dysentery and sleeping sickness especially affected Europeans and their animals. Livingstone became obsessed with mapping the interior and finding the routes of the Zambezi and Nile rivers so they could be used in trade that would replace and end the slave trade. He was among the first Europeans to make a trans-continental trek across South Africa.

On one of his last trips to the interior of Africa, Livingstone seems to have disappeared for six years. The American newspaper, The New York Herald, sent correspondent Henry Morton Stanley to find him. When Stanley finally located Livingstone, he famously greeted him with “Dr. Livingstone, I presume?”
